IN THE LIVING: THE GANZEPOOT

The Ganzepoot is a lock complex in Nieuwpoort's inner harbour. Six waterways meet in the complex, which are connected to the North Sea via the Ganzepoot and the estuary of the Ijzer.

The Ganzepoot lock complex dates from the end of the nineteenth century. Seen from above, it has a ground plan in the shape of a goose's foot. Hence the name.

The vannen or outlet locks of the complex allow the low polders to get rid of excess water, while the locks regulate the water level of the canals for the purpose of navigation. The doors of the vannen are closed at high tide; at low tide they are opened to channel excess water to the sea. The actual locks are used for navigation.

The Ganzenpoort played an important role in the First World War.

The Germans were rapidly advancing in Belgium in October 1914. The Allies were in danger of being overrun, so they took a drastic decision. On Sunday 25 October 1914, the flooding of the Ijzervlakte started. The 59-year-old Karel Cogge, dike keeper of Polder Noordwatering Veurne, gives the instructions to bring the plan to fruition. In the presence of King Albert I, Cogge explains to the military commanders at Veurne town hall how to proceed. Hendrik Geeraert, a boatman from Nieuwpoort, along with four military officers, work four nights in a row to manually open the eight openings of the drainage sluice of the 'Ganzepoot', in Nieuwpoort's inner harbour. Each time at high tide, every 12 hours, they open the locks.

On 29 October, the plain between Nieuwpoort and Diksmuide is completely flooded. The result is a status quo. The Belgians dig in on one side, the Germans on the other. There will be no more major offensives; it is the beginning of four years of trench warfare.

IN THE BEDROOM:

JAMES ENSOR

BATHING IN OSTEND

In this coloured etching, Ensor gives his impression of bathing on the beach in Ostend. On the left is a large number of bathing carriages, which one could hire and in which one could change clothes. After a coachman had harnessed the horse for the carriage, he drove the carriage into the water, and when one arrived there well and truly and the stairs had been turned off, the coachman struck the roof with his whip, signalling that the guests could leave the vehicle. Then one could see the ridiculous and monstrous creatures making their way into the water in their striped swimming costumes. For many natives and visitors to Ostend, this was an amusing spectacle. Ensor had a different take on the event. His friend, the literary André de Ridder writes how Ensor unites hundreds of these sea insulting invaders with their flaws and ludicrousness into a madcap dance of fools in the water.
